THE HISTORY

The last time the two sides met in Scotland, Wayne Rooney led England to a famous victory in Glasgow with two second-half strikes, as the Three Lions extended their winning streak to six.

The visitors were lively from the off, and Danny Welbeck was given an early sight of goal when Rooney played him into the left side of the box. But the Arsenal man's shot was straight at keeper David Marshall and Scotland were able to clear.

Gordon Strachan's team gradually got a foot-hold in the game and were beginning to exert pressure on England's rear-guard, but failed to trouble Forster's goal. The Three Lions took the lead just after the half-hour when Oxlade-Chamberlain bagged his fourth goal in an England shirt. Jack Wilshere picked the ball up on the left and sent in an inviting cross towards his Gunners team-mate. The Ox applied the deftest of touches and it was all that was needed to take it past Marshall in goal.

A free-kick from the right was cleared only as far as Wilshere, who shot towards goal from 20 yards. The ball was deflected off target but was helped back in towards Rooney on the penalty spot and he rose, generating enough power to guide past Craig Gordon, who had only just come on.

Then with time ticking away from the home nation, Andy Robertson gave them a lifeline.

A neat one-two just inside the box, the Hull City left-back tucked away past Forster just inside the upright. It gave the Tartan Army a reason to hope for a comeback, but they were dashed almost instantly when Rooney added the third before somersaulting his way towards the England fans in the corner of Celtic Park.
